AMERICAN MUSIC IN LONDON "PRIMS"

Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles" and MacDowell's Concerto No. 2 in D Minor Included in Sir Henry Wood's Programs—The Concerts Not So Well Attended as in Former Years

I WONDER how long ago it is since Robert Newman, the director of the Queen's Hall Promenade Concerts, and I played lacrosse together in the first club to be founded south of the Thames? Anyway, a club photograph reminds me that in those days I had a cricket-team (eleven a side) for a moustache, and that Robert Newman was a slip of an athlete very difficult to catch in sixty yards. Now, sixty feet would be neither half of us puffing and blowing like a couple of contra-pulling traction engines. He has grown portly also, or, is it not, rather, majestic; whilst, alas, am a stone under my proper weight. The cares of the London autumn music season rest lightly on Robert Newman's ample shoulders and his welcoming smile and penetrating grey eyes are as genial as ever. The attendance at the concerts is not, so far, so good as it used to be and some writers have been in haste to attribute this to the inclusion of works of German composers in the programs. Robert Newman thinks otherwise.

"You see," he said to me last Friday, "so many of our chaps are away. The medical student is a practicing sawbones; the Somersett-house-young-man has left his girl behind him and has followed the life and the drum." (At least Robert Newman didn't, like Silas Wegg, drop into the poetic vein, I did it for him.) "We miss the provincial and the American visitor also," added W. Newman. "They were always the backbone of our reserved seats—if a reserved seat may be said to have a backbone. I can remember many an unreserved seat in my youth that seemed to have a backbone. But to approach a serious matter seriously, the people are not here in their usual density this season, because, like the famous birds which were not flying in the famous sky,

"There were no birds to fly."

"As to the unpopularity of German music, you know that we do nothing later than Brahms, and to-night, when 'Solo- man' is to play the No. 1 Concerto in D Minor (Op. 15), it is one of the best houses of the season so far." Down below me was the familiar sea of straw hats turned in the direction of the white-clad ten-year-old pianist-who was to convince us, once again, that pianists are very neglectful of this finely emotional Mozartian concerto; that within its classic dimensions there is a fire and a passion totally unlike the academic Brahms of the Serenades which it so soon followed in order of creation, and that "Solomon" was not only wise in his choice, but endowed with enough masculinity to carry its performance to a triumphant issue. Unfortunately he failed, it seemed to me, in the last portion of his self-imposed task, although the public, if they enjoyed an unequal performance, recalled this remarkably gifted boy again and again. He has obviously confronted with his youth and his artistry our very sentimental public.

Sentimental Solomon

And it is this very sea of sentiment in which "Solomon" is in some danger of being drowned. He is a pupil of Adele Verne, of whom the public has perhaps heard more coincidence, or it may be my vaporing fancy, but not only Amadeus, the sensitive handle names of Adele and the great Jules who romanticized science for all schoolboys thirty years ago the same, but their methods are sentimentally affiliated. I felt this, conspicuously, in "Solomon's" treatment of the Adagio, with its beautiful beauteousness, but only in the other symphonic programme melody which the bassoons so lovingly developed into a dirge-like solemnity, like a funeral service for the seven thousand hard-holding people, which the papers tell me one enthusiast is about to send out to the enemy trenches. I hope!

No, "Solomon," if you are wise, you will stop this tendency to over-sentimentalise everything. Not that I blame you only. What was Sir Henry J. Wood doing that he allowed his orchestra to go fast asleep? I grant you that it was a warm August night, without a breath of air stirring, but that is not sufficient reason for putting us to sleep at nine o'clock in the evening. It may be my fancy, but it seems to me that, since he has become a professor at the Royal Academy of Music, Sir Henry has lost a lot of that fine frenzy which made him such a firebrand five or six Wagner seasons ago. It used to be said that over the portal of Teuterdon Street—the early home of the R. A. M., where they used to have eight pianofortes in full blast in one room—was written, "Abandon hope all ye who enter here," but since the R. A. M. has moved to the fine new palace in Marylebone I have been told that it is otherwise. Let us hope that presently, Sir Henry also will be otherwise.

In making of his programs, however, exhibit no sign of slackness and, to back a little, I ought to tell you that one of the earliest novelties of the season was an undoubted success of d'erteme. However, I have my doubts as to whether Charles Martin Loeffler's eighteen-year-old 'Death of Tintagiles,' will find a more or less permanent place in our programmes. There is such a jostling and hustling going on just now among living composers that it would be a brave man who would prophesy who will or will not survive. Anyway, I have been given this work by the Alsatian violinist-composer whom you were introduced to in your home circle, was highly favorable. Not that I see that I am type with my not very capable Lawrence Gilman and can at once give service to Mr. Loeffler, on the strength of his "Tintagiles," a place in the Wallahs of the immortal. This I must defer until I have heard the other works by him which are promised later in the season. That I look forward to with interest must be my tribute to the quality of this extremely well written example of the work of one who is, undoubtedly, a highly accomplished musician. I am also personally indebted to his for his sympathetic and highly interesting treatment of the viola.

Speaking of compositions by American composers, here is an outburst from my well-trusted deputy:

"At present the old glamar has not returned to the 'Prims,' nor is the house filled as of yore, many of the seats being empty. I went early on Tuesday and heard the first part of the program. Schubert's 'Rosamunde,'&mdash;so, ever, a dress and a merry Padding song—"Au vieux" with undoubted charm, and the fine quality of her voice came out splendidly. Claude Debussy's 'Le Martyre de Saint-Sorlin' sent all the critics away.

MacDowell Concerts Played

"MacDowell's Concerto No. 2 in D Minor with Ceci Banner at the piano, was played with such dignity and pathos that it was enough for me to take away with me the divine art running through my veins, for it was perfectly adorable!" I do not often permit the adorable female to express her adoration so audaciously. There is enough spontaneity about this to tempt me to print it as it is one of the few times that MacDowell is just one of those who deserve it.

During the past season we have had a most accomplished band of Indian musici

Here are the facts:

Q Mr. Godowsky disappeared on Wednesday Evening, September 1st.
Q He retired into seclusion to complete musical editorial work and to prepare his programs for his forthcoming tour under our direction.
Q His whereabouts were discovered on Thursday Evening, September 9th.

"To assure our clients and the music-loving public that Mr. Godowsky has been and is in the best of health and that he will positively fill all his concert engagements booked through us.
